Say I have a table T, which contains a column "Numeric value". The table is used to track items as they are moved around a warehouse. When the item is moved, I need to record the status of the location it was moved too (either hold, moved, or released), and if it was moved, the new location it was moved too. I also need a column to track the date it was moved, and I'd like to use a trigger to create this column. The problem is, I have a large number of tables, because I have many warehouses, each of which has a number of locations. I need to know where the items were moved from, but I can only assign a location once I know where the item was moved from. Do I need to create a table for each warehouse, and a table for each location inside the warehouse, or is there some way to link the information between the tables, in a single database? A: This is why relational databases are better than the "relational database that works in your language" alternative. "If I can only assign a location once I know where the item was moved from. Do I need to create a table for each warehouse, and a table for each location inside the warehouse" I don't know if you're aware of this, but it's absolutely impossible to track something like that inside a relational database. Consider this: You want to track the location of item A, in a warehouse with locations L1, L2, L3, L4, L5, L6, L7. You would have: The tables: Warehouse(id, location,...) Location(id, name,...) Item(id, location,...) "The table Item contains two rows, one for each location from which the item was moved." This means that the data model you've chosen doesn't have the schema that you want. Instead, you should have one table with one location. So, your schema looks like this: Warehouse(id, location,...) Location(id, name,...) Item(id, location,...)
